Social movements have become increasingly important form of participation in democracy, beyond the traditional means of joining political parties and fighting elections. This is evident in Brazil, where large street protests on a number of issues have featured people from a range of backgrounds. In this audio interview, Cheryl Brumley spoke to Marília Pontes Esposito and Raquel Sousa of the University of São Paulo to discover more about the trend.

Democratisation took place in Brazil in 1985, after more than two decades of military dictatorship. It is clear this period still casts a shadow over Brazilian society, although we have also seen vociferous social movements emerging across the country as people take advantage of, and seek to strengthen, their democratic rights. The current President Dilma Rousseff was herself involved with guerilla groups fighting the military government in the 1960s and 1970s.

Tensions have been played out on the streets of Brazil's cities, including in the widespread rioting since 2013. Protests began in response to public transport fare increases, but have drawn in other issues including police brutality and the costs of staging both the 2014 football world cup and the 2016 Olympic Games.

In this interview, Marilia Pontes Esposito and Raquel Sousa explore the role and composition of social movements in Brazil. They suggest that the participants have changed since democratisation, with younger and poorer people more likely to take part, as well as the highly-educated middle class. Social movements have not necessarily supplanted political parties in the democratic process, but do allow people to participate differently.

For instance, some movements have an expressive dimension rather than specific political demands, such as the SlutWalk marches. The structure of social movements also differs from traditional political groups, with a move away from hierarchy toward horizontal organisation, with flexible leaderships.

Marilia Pontes Esposito is a Professor of the Sociology of Education and Raquel Sousa a doctoral candidate at the University of São Paulo.
